Abstract (limité à 150 mots)	Contemporary African societies neglect agricultural practices and techniques that ensure maximum production with the least possible negative environmental effects due to lack of evidence for practice. As a low income country, Cameroon faces the problem of lack of accessible, good quality evidence to inform decision making in environmental management. Consequently, decision makers derive policies from available empirical studies or on personal experience and expertise probably due to longevity in the field or input from peers and collaborators. Data collection was carried out by overview of existing literature,

	interviews and focus group discussions with stakeholders The reality shows a trend of old practices that need to be improved to meet international standards and improve the wellbeing of all the actors in the entire production/supply chain. There is equally a great gap in the generation, synthesis and implementation of evidence in the agricultural sector that needs to be addressed
