Abstract (limited to 150 words)	There is growing recognition that the management of ecosystem services needs to go beyond ensuring only the sustainability of these services. A growing body of evidence is shifting the emphasis of ecosystem services management to include the reduction of poverty in its various forms. This is particularly true for sub-Saharan Africa where many people remain directly reliant on ecosystem services for their subsistence and survival. As part of an externally-funded project administered via the Ecosystem Services for Poverty Alleviation (ESPA) programme, we produced a systematic and interactive map of the evidence on the links between ecosystem services and multi-dimensional poverty reduction in Africa. Following systematic review methodology, this map identifies evidence 'gaps and gluts' on this topic. Through engagement and co-production with decision-makers in sub-Saharan Africa, the map has been used as a tool to enhance the ability of environmental decision-makers to engage with evidence when making decisions.

Required support for French/English translation (for talks)	Yes
